Say No to Nano in Cosmetics

Nanomaterials are super-tiny manmade chemicals that may pose extraordinary and unpredictable risks to public health. The FDA is concerned about these micro-sized ingredients because their toxicity may be very different, and potentially more severe than normal-sized chemical ingredients. Products of concern that have been identified may be found in the “Skin Deep Report.” Products at trio affected by this new awareness campaign are Jane Iredale’s Blush “Sheer Honey” and Jan Marini TGF Products.

Chemicals in your Cosmetics = Chemicals in You

Are you curious about the chemicals in your body?

EWG (Environmental Working Group), in partnership with Stanford University, is conducting a scientific study to test young women age 14-19 for chemicals found in many cosmetics and personal care products. If you’re interested in participating, please contact Becky Sutton at 866-222-7059 x 304 to find out more about the study.
